SAFETY TEAM ARRIVES IN TEXAS TO PROBE DEADLY BALLOON CRASH

I U.S. safety officials arrived in Texas on Sunday to probe the crash of a hot air balloon that killed 16 people, amid reports that it hit a power line and caught fire before plummeting to the ground. The balloon crashed on Saturday into a field near Lockhart, about 30 miles south of Austin, on Saturday, killing all of those aboard. Aerial television footage showed remnants of the red, white and blue balloon, adorned with a large, yellow smiley face wearing sunglasses, lying flattened at the crash site. A witness told reporters the craft struck a power line and emergency responders said the basket had caught fire. REUTERS

REUTERS/IPSOS POLL: CLINTON LEADS TRUMP BY 6 POINTS

2 Hillary Clinton held a 6-percentage-point lead over Donald Trump, according to a Reuters/Ipsos poll with new wording that was released on Friday. Nearly 41 percent of likely voters favor Clinton, 35 percent favor Trump, and 25 percent picked "Other," according to the new July 25-29 online poll of 1,043 likely voters, which overlapped with the Democratic National Convention in Philadelphia. The poll has a credibility interval of 4 percentage points. The presidential tracking poll reflects a slight change of wording from previous surveys, replacing the "Neither/Other" option given to respondents with just "Other." An internal review had found the word "Neither" has, at times, siphoned support away from one or the other candidate. REUTERS

ONE DEAD, TWO MISSING IN MARYLAND FLOODING

3 Flooding from torrential rain killed at least one person in Ellicott City, Maryland, and at least two people are missing after floodwaters swept through the town's historic downtown, officials said on Sunday. Ellicott City was pounded by almost 6 inches of rain in two hours late on Saturday, sending the Patapsco River out of its banks, officials said. Howard County Executive Allan Kittleman said the flooding in Ellicott City, about 35 miles northeast of Washington, was worse than that from Hurricane Agnes in 1972. "I don't believe there's ever been a flood and the devastation that we've had overnight in Ellicott City," he said in an interview with Baltimore's WBAL NewsRadio. REUTERS

MOSQUITOES ON THE PROWL

You think you've been feeling bugged by the heat and humidity? Well, now you're going to feel bugged-out by the latest mosquito forecasts.

Yes, I did say the latest mosquito forecast.

This is something, and it's because mosquitoes transmit diseases, with the Zika virus the biggest concern right now. Other diseases that can spread through mosquito bites are dog heartworm and West Nile virus, to name a few.

Mosquitoes get real active when it's hot and humid, and that's been the case for most of the Northeast this entire summer, with the exception of parts of New England.

When you take a look at your latest Accu-weather forecast you will see the latest mosquito forecast attached to it: Conditions are high for Boston and New York and extremely high for Philadelphia.

With all the rain during the past few days, standing water, puddles, birdbaths and boat tarps make for ideal breeding grounds for mosquitoes.

So load up on your bug spray and keep a close eye on your pets, I would not leave them outside for too long.

So the good news is the stifling heat that was smothering parts of the Northeast especially from Philly to NYC, is gone. However, the bad news is it has been extinguished by waves of localized heavy rain, storms, flash flooding and now mosquito alerts.

Bolaris' Weather Watch

Storms and flash flooding will continue into Tuesday, however a true breath of fresh air will arrive Wednesday and Thursday, before more heat returns by Friday and into Saturday.

The tropics are starting to get active, and right now I'm keeping an eye on a quick-moving disturbance south of Puerto Rico that has a decent chance of developing into a tropical storm as it moves into the Western Caribbean.

Gotta go. I'm starting to itch.

Police: Boston-area bicycle thief replaces new bikes with old bikes

Police have said that if anyone is seen leaving a bicycle and taking another, it is not part of a program for sharing bikes.

JASON NUCKOLLS
@MetroBOS
letters@metro.us

Authorities in Marblehead are investigating a recent series of bicycle thefts in which the culprit replaces the stolen bikes with older, less valuable ones.

During the last week, Marblehead police said several residents have found their bicycles missing from their property and replaced with bikes of lesser value, WHDH reported. There was not an apparent pattern or area of town that seemed to be targeted.

CHRIS PHAN/FLOXER

"It's sort of one of those crimes of opportunity," Police Chief Robert Picariello told the Salem News. He recommended that residents lock up their bikes and said area kids were most likely responsible.

Police have also said that if anyone is seen leaving a bicycle and taking another, it is not part of program for sharing bikes, WHDH added.

"If they have a bike, I don't know why they need to get another one," 13-year-old Rei Newman, whose bike was recently stolen and replaced with an older one, said to NECN. "That's what the police said — they just upgraded. They just threw a bad bike on the street."

Harvard Summer School student drowns in Charles River

The body of a Harvard Summer School student was recovered from the bottom of the Charles River Friday by the Cambridge Fire Department divers.

The student, identified as Tyler S. Greene, 18, from Georgia, was pronounced dead by drowning, the Harvard Crimson reported.

According to the Middlesex County District Attorney Marian T. Ryan, the drowning was likely accidental.

Police responded to the scene around 8:45 p.m. on Friday after witnesses reported seeing a male "go into the Charles River [and] come up with arms flailing and go under and not come back up," according to a press release. Divers recovered the body just after 9 p.m.; he was taken to Bet Israel, and was later pronounced dead.

Greene's family told the Boston Globe that the teen was at Harvard for a seven-week program to improve his computer programming skills after graduating from East Paulding High School in Dallas, Georgia.

"He was my rock," Greene's mother, Leonie Grant, said. "It's just an unfathomable feeling. Words can't express it right now."

'The Voice of the T' is trying to hit the big time

Frank Oglesby Jr., who provided voiceover recordings to the MBTA for over 20 years, is retiring to pursue his dreams of announcing full time.

CHRIS CAESAR
letters@metro.us

After more than 30 years on the job at the MBTA, Frank Oglesby Jr. is retiring — but don't expect him to take it easy.

The transit agency veteran wore many hats over the years, though his most well-known contributions to the system are the pre-recorded voiceover messages that have played for riders on the system for more than 20 years.

Oglesby, who had a passion for voiceover and broadcasting since he was 15 years old, will continue to do some audio work for the T on an as-needed basis. But the now former deputy director of the T's The Ride program will pursue his childhood dream, full time.

"There's all kinds of uses for voice talent — audio books, apps — all kinds of stuff," Oglesby said when reached by phone, his voice immediately recognizable. "There's room for a lot of us now. Back when I started to try and break into it 35 years ago, there were just a few people who owned the [voiceover] market. Each market just had a few people, and clients would use them to death. It's very different now."

Oglesby said his interest in voice work first started as a high school student, when he idolized legendary announcer Ernie Anderson and first started to dream about becoming a radio DJ. He started visiting stations and reaching out to those in the industry, many of whom he said were "very supportive."

From there, Oglesby matriculated to UMass Amherst, where he was known as "The Voice" — not just for his resonant vocal chords, but the thunderous delivery he employed when broadcasting station announcements for the college station.

"I would say that the station was 'The voice of Pioneer Valley,'" he said, still perfectly landing the baritone-pitch line 30 years later.

And it stuck. From there, Oglesby said he spent his last year of college interning at WCVB, where he said many encouraged him to develop his skills as a full-time broadcaster. Despite the promising accolades, after college Oglesby took a more practical route and starting working as an editorial assistant for the MBTA's general manager in 1985.

"At that time I was young — callow youth, lack of confidence — you don't follow through with certain things," he said. "It felt ephemeral. It didn't feel real."

Still, even at the MBTA,

Oglesby was known as the guy with a golden voice among his co-workers, leading to a chance opportunity: the agency's audio/visual department needed someone to do some voiceover narration for the authority's human resources training videos.

"[The director] had heard there was a new guy around, someone who had a great voice, and he asked me if I would be willing to read for him," Oglesby recalled. "He ended up liking how I sounded."

From there, Oglesby was the obvious candidate to be the "voice of the T" when the agency got its first trains featuring automatic audio voiceovers. Those cars first premiered on the Red Line in 1994.

Twenty-two years later, Oglesby says people still see his MBTA lanyard, hear his voice, and recognize him as "The Voice of the T."

"Once I was in a Starbucks with my 15-year-old son, and all of a sudden the barista says: 'Are you Frank Oglesby?'" he said, laughing. "She just got so excited and I look over at my son, and he's shaking his head."

Soon, Oglesby hopes to be recognized for more than just his subway voiceovers.

"People haven't heard my best stuff, I am actually much better than what people hear on the train announcements," he said. "I am capable of much more than that."

Paris Hilton thinks she could be an ISIS target

ALL PHOTOS
GETTY IMAGES

Being famous isn't all that it's cracked up to be — according to Paris Hilton, at least.

The socialite and hotel heiress, who is currently working as a DJ in Ibiza, recently told a Spanish newspaper that she's afraid her celebrity status might make her a potential ISIS target.

Responding to the recent terrorist attacks in Nice and Germany, Hilton said in an interview that she worries about being the victim of an attack. "I'm constantly moving around from one country to another, and I'm a famous person who could be a definite target for an attack, and that is something that sometimes terrifies me," she said.

Clearly, a jetsetting lifestyle isn't all fun and games for Hilton. Still, fear won't be stopping her anytime soon — earlier this month, the 35-year-old revealed that she'll be following in her family's footsteps and launching her own chain of luxury hotels in Dubai, New York and Las Vegas.

Constance Wu slams Matt Damon's controversial new film

Constance Wu is the latest actress to lash out against the lack of diversity in Hollywood.

On Friday, the "Fresh Off the Boat" star posted a statement on Twitter that blasted Matt Damon's upcoming film, "The Great Wall." In the film, the 45-year-old actor plays a soldier in ancient China who defends the Great Wall against a mythical attack.

The casting decision quickly attracted the attention — and disapproval — of Wu. "We have to stop perpetuating the racist myth that only a white man can save the world. It's not based in actual fact," she wrote. "Our heroes don't look like Matt Damon. They look like Malala. Ghandi. Mandela."

Wu is one of several people to point out the lack of Asian representation in Hollywood, an issue that has gained noticeable traction recently — earlier this year, Scarlett Johansson's casting in a remake of the Japanese anime "Ghost in the Shell" and Tilda Swinton's portrayal of a Tibetan character in "Doctor Strange" both drew heavy criticism of Hollywood's "white-washing" tendencies.

Hours after publishing her statement, Wu followed up with another tweet to clear the air with Damon. "For the millionth time it's NOT abt blame. Not blaming Damon, the studio, the Chinese financiers. It's not about blame. It's about AWARENESS," she wrote.

"The Great Wall" is scheduled for release in February 2017.

Dating is not a numbers game

LAURIE DAVIS EDWARDS

Single and Sciping

Laurie Davis Edwards is the founder of eFlirt, an online dating concierge service, and the best-selling author of "Love @ First Click: The Ultimate Guide to Online Dating."

Numbers can represent quantity, but what they can never completely convey is quality. In your dating life, who you are meeting and the way you are connecting on your dates is much more important than how many matches are in your inbox. Quality cannot be quantified in a spreadsheet.

If you're a number cruncher, you might logically understand this but still feel resistant, like my client. When I told him that not only should he not concern himself with numbers, but that OkCupid data that suggest excellent messages receive a 40 percent response rate is outdated, he asked me, "Well, what should the average response rate be for me?"

The truth: There is no magic formula that says if you get a certain percentage of replies on a dating site, you'll find love. After working with thousands of online daters for nearly a decade, I've found that there is no average. There are too many variables, like which platform you're on and whom you're choosing to message. Some online daters receive a 5 percent response rate while others reach 40 percent. But in either case, love doesn't fit neatly into an empty cell on a spreadsheet.

One of our clients received a 90 percent response rate ... yet she is still single. Another married the first man who responded. So next time you get the urge to count the messages in your inbox, ask yourself: Am I truly connecting with the matches I meet? When you meet the right person, none of the numbers matter.

Kanye tells Tidal and Apple to squash beef

Kanye West has finally taken a break from his drama with Taylor Swift to focus on another feud — the music streaming battle between Tidal and Apple Music.

On Saturday, the "Famous" rapper took to Twitter to rant about the two music industry giants, claiming their beef was "f—king up the music game."

West, alongside Jay Z, Beyonce, and several other high-profile musicians, is a co-founder of Tidal.

The battle began back in 2015, when Apple released its own music streaming platform just three months after Tidal's launch. Since then, the two have been competing over exclusive content, making it difficult for fans to access their favorite music in one place.

Despite ongoing rumors that Apple might try and acquire Tidal, West's social media posts suggest these talks aren't going so smoothly. "Apple give Jay his check for Tidal now and stop trying to act like you Steve," the 39-year-old rapper tweeted.

West is calling for a meeting between himself, Apple CEO Tim Cook, Jay Z and several other music execs to try and end the feud. "We all gon be dead in 100 Years. Let the kids have the music," he wrote.

Recently a client sent over a spreadsheet of his results with online dating. It was incredibly detailed — broken down by platform and multiple data points, such as the number of women who replied to his first messages, then second messages and so on.

He's not my first — I've seen other spreadsheets.

It seems simple to run the dating data when it's quantified on an app or site, so naturally, many online daters get the urge to crunch numbers. But there's a major problem with taking the fun of dating and turning it into a numbers game.

"BOJACK HORSEMAN": SEASON 3

What's more surreal than a show about a world in which talking animals and humans live (and sometimes breed) together? That it's both the funniest and saddest show on television right now. In the third season, our anti-hero — a depressed, alcoholic horse (voice of Will Arnett), who used to star on a cheesy family sitcom — hits rock bottom. Although that's what it felt like last season. As Blur once said, no matter how low, there's always somewhere to go.

Once again, things start out hopeful: BoJack has a hit film and serious awards talk. Once again, things slowly fall apart. And once again we see a show that's quick with a loopy joke — dumb puns, bizarre wordplay, silly sight gags — show that it's also peerlessly insightful about self-loathing and the way bad feels can be as addictive as the drugs and drink BoJack keeps at hand. Every season has gotten rough, but this time the vicious circle of his life may have officially driven away even his closest allies.

Here's the part where we pull back and remind you that "BoJack Horseman" is superduper hilarious. It remains a fount of nuttiness, with an entire episode underwater, a live (but "tasteful") abortion TV special and a whale-staffed strip club for the whole family. There's a bat mitzvah for bats and Character Actress Margo Martindale returns, this time with a bazooka. Even at its darkest, it's still superfunny — un-Jessica Biel-ievably funny!

Will Arnett returns as an equine alkier in the third season of "BoJack Horseman," now streaming on Netflix. METRO

HOW TO GET AHEAD

Careers after — and during — cancer

During treatment, continuing to work can provide a sense of accomplishment and normalcy.

ALIZAH SALARIO
@Alirosa
alizah.salario@metrcus

Cancer is not a death sentence. Many people living with the disease continue to work throughout their diagnosis and treatment.

But by its very nature, cancer is disruptive. No one finds working while receiving chemo or radiation an "orderly situation," says Rebecca Nellis, chief mission officer at the nonprofit Cancer and Careers.

However, a positive workplace can be a tremendous source of support during a challenging time. A recent Cancer and Careers survey found that 75 percent of respondents wanted to keep working after their diagnosis because it provides them with a sense of pride and accomplishment that is critical to recovery.

Nellis, who works with cancer patients, offered her insights on working during treatment.

Gather information

Before revealing your diagnosis to your employer — if, in fact, you chose to do so — fact-finding is a crucial first step. Knowing the timeline for your treatment plan, the possible side effects and precisely how they will affect your ability to do your job can help you present the situation to an employer feeling informed and prepared, explains Nellis.

Next, comb through your employee handbook and gather info about disability and sick leave policies. Understanding exactly what you're entitled to can give you confidence when sharing sensitive information.

Know your rights

Nellis emphasizes that it's crucial to know your rights guaranteed by the Americans with Disabilities Act. (Though the word "cancer" isn't anywhere in the title, the law still applies.)

"The ADA does two important things: protect from discrimination and provide a reasonable accommodation," explains Nellis.

A "reasonable accommodation" means that employers are required to provide assistance or modifications that allow employees who have a disability to continue to do their job.

"If we're talking about someone who is a retail manager and fatigue is going to be a major factor, can they stand for eight hours a day?" says Nellis.

Know what support looks like

A pro-tip for those who work with someone going through cancer treatment: Don't coddle or condescend.

"Co-workers shouldn't become so focused on the cancer that they forget the colleague they're talking to," says Nellis. "They're there because they want to work, and work provides normalcy."

Even gestures that come from a good place, like running an office fundraiser or taking on additional responsibility on behalf of a sick colleague, need buy-in.

"If they're really private, they may not want something [calling attention to their illness]," adds Nellis. "Make sure you run everything by the colleague, and get their support."

Ty offering to do very specific tasks — buying lunch for a week or assisting with a particular part of the job, suggests Nellis. This can send a message of support without smothering.

Know your worth outside of work

In some instances, people with cancer stay on the job out of necessity: Work provides the income and benefits paying for their treatment. Other times, the motivation is personal: Self-worth and work often are inextricably linked.

"We work because it's part of our identity, so it really challenges a sense of self," Nellis states.

That's why if working becomes untenable, some people "may struggle to see themselves as more than just their cancer diagnosis."

This sense of loss is particularly hard for people in their 20s and 30s, because they're "prone to seeing their job as a key part of their identity ... you're part of something, and most people don't want to worry about being left behind," says Nellis.

If a cancer patient is forced to leave work, Nellis encourages them to ask about financial assistance programs or disability insurance.

Mind the gap (on your resume)

For cancer patients who do take time off, the return to work can "become a really stressful piece of the puzzle," says Nellis. "We spend a lot of time working with people about how they're going to sell themselves."

In some cases, a life-changing illness is an opportunity for survivors to professionally pivot. Nellis has worked with many people who wonder if "60 hours a week is worth it" after they've faced their mortality.

Though she doesn't have all the answers, Nellis says career-related questions often change after cancer.

"It's more about what gives you meaning? What do you derive joy from?"

ROOTING FOR USA BASKETBALL IS NO FUN

Matt Burke is the National Sports Editor and a columnist at Metro US.

Follow him on Twitter @burke_metro

The absolute worst rooting experience you can have as a sports fan is when you find yourself rooting for a team to simply not lose.

The high of victory for teams like these is really not that high, but the low of defeat is depression city. Yeah, it's fine that your team is expected to win it all, but those ridiculous expectations ruin the rooting and viewing experience entirely.

Rooting for the USA men's basketball team at the Olympics has been like this for 20 years now. There's little fun in watching these multimillionaires attempt to bring home the gold, other than getting to see the occasional highlight reel alley-oop (something that happens 15 to 20 times during each and every NBA All-Star game).

Now, the original Dream Team in 1992 — with Michael Jordan, Larry Bird, Magic Johnson, Charles Barkley, Patrick Ewing et al. — was great. Never before had we seen a collection of talent like that on one court together and never before had we seen that level of dominance.

But dominance like that quickly gets boring. Remember who was on Dream Team II in 1996 in Atlanta? Nope, neither do I. In 2004 in Athens, Argentina won the gold medal. Team USA earned the most pathetic bronze medal in Olympic history. If memory serves, there was no ticker-tape parade down the Canyon of Heroes for Allen Iverson, Tim Duncan, Stephon Marbury, a young LeBron James and a young Carmelo Anthony when they returned to the states that summer.

Dominance had turned to apathy when it came to USA basketball, and now today we're in this super-awkward third stage where we're just hoping Team USA 2016 doesn't screw this thing up.

Making matters more awkward is that the best player on this summer's team is Kevin

Rooting for Coach K is a chore. GETTY IMAGES

Durant, who just four weeks ago became the most hated athlete in the U.S. Durant decided to join the Golden State Warriors in an effort to create the most dominant team in NBA history. Now, he will look to change the opinions of thousands of jaded American basketball fans over the next few weeks by trying to beat Venezuela by 60 points and by generally attempting to — you guessed it — dominate. In other words, he will apologize for his desire to dominate by dominating players who will never sniff an NBA floor.

Meanwhile, the head coach of Team USA is the lovable Mike Krzyzewski, who has a popular Facebook page dedicated to him titled, "Mike Krzyzewski is the Antichrist." As if Coach K wasn't hard enough to root for to begin with, he's been yelling at his players during these recent exhibition games to sit down on the bench and "not have so much fun." DeMar DeRozan tried a 360 dunk, nearly decapitating a Chinese defender this past week and Coach K flipped out because a couple guys (remember, multimillionaire men) on his bench actually had the nerve to get excited. Imagine what Coach K would have done to Barkley in '92 when he was throwing elbows at 160-pound Angolan "power" forwards? Here's my solution to all this crap: Have a real Team USA.

Many claim that the reason the rest of the world has closed the gap is because these other countries have players who have played together for years. And, yes, that's part of the issue for sure.

But why can't the U.S. assemble a team of blue-chip high schoolers every four years and build for the next Olympics? There would be new cycle of young U.S. talent every Olympic summer. Have these kids play together for four years during each and every summer. Hell, sign some of them to Team USA contracts and have them skip the farce that is college basketball altogether.

Basketball junkies would salivate over getting to watch these teams grow over the course of four years, and it would be highly intriguing to see if these groups of talented young-uns could eventually take down the men who are on the rest of the world's rosters during the Olympics.

That would certainly be a fun rooting experience. Much more fun than the one we're about to undertake.

Aries Get involved in activities or events that will allow you to show off what you have to offer. A personal change will give you greater stability and tame any insecurity you harbor.

Taurus Spend time with the people who make a difference in your life. Take care of health issues. Consider an alternative approach as well as a traditional method of treatment.

Gemini Don't share personal secrets or beliefs. Someone will take advantage of you if you are too forthcoming. A personal change will help build confidence. Romance is highlighted.

Cancer Refuse to let moodiness take over. You will get more sympathy and workable solutions if you share your concerns without showing anger or criticism. Work with, not against, the majority.

Leo A personal gain will come from an unexpected source. You'll meet someone interesting while traveling or reunite with people from your past. Take your time responding to an offer.

Virgo Socialize with colleagues and you will find out information that will help you get ahead. Don't let anyone limit your chance to try something different.

Libra Consider where the information you are receiving is coming from before you let your emotions take over. You are better off critiquing yourself, not others, if you want to avoid discord.

Scorpio Travel outside your usual realm. Getting a broader spectrum will stir your imagination and help you create a personal environment that suits your nature. Let your emotions be your guide.

Sagittarius Put your time into personal improvement. The less you do with people offering indulgent temptations, the easier it will be to take care of business and build a stable future.

Capricorn Use your emotions to your benefit. You can manipulate a situation if you are tactful and persuasive. A deal will have strings attached. Check the fine print.

Aquarius Look at change as a new beginning filled with opportunity and something that will motivate you to learn and expand your interests. Turn a negative into a positive.

Pisces Protect against being judged by someone from a different background by offering an amicable solution to any disagreement that arises.
